Letter from the Secretary-General

Dear fellow-members of the IAHR,

In the pages of this bulletin, may I draw your attention especially to the draft agenda for the mid-term meeting of the International Committee to be held in Paris? Any further items for discussion may be communicated to me or, of course, to the President, Prof. Ugo Bianchi. This should be done, please, before the end of June, because during the summer I shall be travelling in Japan for research purposes.

As to the Paris meeting, please note that the conference arrangements are being handled by our hosting Vice-President, Prof. Jean Leclant. Things are evidently shaping up very well and the conference is set to become an important link in the chain of IAHR-related events. The conferences held approximately once each year between the major quinquennial congresses are relatively small as far as the number of participants is concerned. On the one hand they provide a forum for continuity, because at least some of the Executive Committee (and the Editorial Board of Numen) are present. At the same time there are always new faces, and therefore new perspectives and dimensions to our corporate activities. Each such conference plays its own special part in developing the identity of the IAHR, and the Paris meeting will surely be no exception. What of St. Petersburg in 1994, which was devised some years ago (for Leningrad) to be a regional conference?

With all best wishes

Michael Pye
The Name

The following letter has been received from Professor Jordan Paper as Treasurer of the Canadian Society for the Study of Religion (La Société Canadienne pour l’Étude de la Religion) and is endorsed by its President, Dr. Jacques Goulet:

At the executive meeting of the Canadian Society for the Study of Religion (CSSR), 31 January 1993, the Executive voted unanimously to support the change in name of the IAHR to the International Association for the Study of Religion (This I understand is also the position of our sister society in Québec). This position will be brought before the Annual General Meeting of the CSSR in June. As the various positions on this issue have been circulated to the associated members of the IAHR, we are forwarding the reasons for our position for consideration by the Association.

Those of us who have personally long been associated with the IAHR tend to be quite comfortable with the present name of the Association. This satisfaction, however, should not cause us to be insensible to the effect on the continuity and relative importance of the IAHR of not changing our name. Perhaps the question can be phrased in terms of the recent growth of the IAHR; that is, is the IAHR to remain primarily a continental western European association or an international one?

I would suggest there are two interrelated aspects of importance: one concerns the terminology used by the constituent societies and the members of these societies, and the other concerns communication to the scholarly world and the general public. With regard to the first aspect, it is to be noted that outside of continental western Europe, none of the constituent societies use the term history of religions, nor for that matter is a single member of the Executive of the IAHR identified with a department of history of religions. The problem in terminology is not simply due to the English language as has been suggested. As a bilingual society, our name in French is La Société Canadienne pour l’Étude de la Religion; the name of our new sister society in Québec is the Société Québécoise pour l’Étude de la Religion. Clearly, in modern French, histoire is not the equivalent of “study,” rather the term in general use is étude.

The second aspect is not a matter of terminological niceties but one of the Association’s survival. Communication, as we all know, has become increasingly condensed. Political speeches, for example, have been replaced by “sound bites” of shorter and shorter duration; the average in North America is now twenty seconds! Names of societies, whether we approve or not, communicate, and they communicate according to the general use of terms. This is true not only among the general population but among scholars. For example, the major funding body of research relevant to religious studies (as well as representation in international scholarly societies) in Canada, the Social Science and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC), in its subdivision of religious studies disciplines, lists history of religions as distinctly different from comparative religion; this categorization, developed by a committee of scholars, understands history of religions to be exactly that — a subcategory of religious studies specific to historical studies. For this reason, we may not receive funds to send a representative to the forthcoming meeting of the International Committee, because the SSHRC understands the IAHR to focus on a minor aspect of religious studies rather than represent religious studies as a whole. The future participation of the CSSR in the IAHR is at risk if there is not compatibility between our name and the international society.

In North America, the influence of Mircea Eliade, including the promotion of the term "history of religions," is waning. Furthermore, at the University of Chicago, where the term was used, its usage was limited to humanistic studies; parallel to the section, "history of religions," in the Divinity School of the University of Chicago is the section, "religion and society." The relatively new scholarly society in the United States, the North American Society for the Study of Religion, obviously chose the word "study" to define itself.

More important in this regard is the relationship between scholars of religion in the United States and the IAHR. Excluding theologians and biblical scholars, several thousand students of religion are members of the American Academy of Religion (AAR), possibly more than in the rest of the world combined. Quite recently, the AAR has begun to develop an international interest to counter the tendency in the United States towards isolationism, even in the realm of scholarship. This in and of itself is a laudable move, but it does affect the IAHR. Since those unfamiliar with the IAHR understand its mandate from a literal reading of its name, it is generally assumed that at present there is no international society for the study of religion. (The United States pays approximately half the amount of dues as does Canada to the IAHR, although there are at least twenty times as many scholars in the AAR as compared to the CSSR.) The Unification Church earlier attempted to fill this assumed vacuum; the AAR may now seek to do so.

Therefore, the question of name change is not simply a matter of terminological niceties or of historical precedent, it may be a question of survival. Unless we are clearly perceived as being an international society of scholars of religion rather than as a small sub-discipline, than others more powerful than us will move to do what we already are doing. It is not likely that we will be able to educate the rest of the world to understand the term "history" differently than it is perceived in most of the universities of the world. On a personal note, I have been calling myself an historian of religion for over twenty-five years, yet, because of this practice, I do not at present have a single colleague at my own university who understands my disciplinary affiliation. It is time I ended the practice; perhaps it is time the IAHR also recognizes the problem.

Sincerely yours,

Delegated Representative to the IAHR and Treasurer/Trésorier

La Société Canadienne pour l’Étude de la Religion

P.S. As President of the CSSR/SCER, I totally agree with Prof. Jordan Paper's views expressed here above.

First announcement and call for papers

The nature of Buddhism in the contemporary world is notoriously difficult to assess. This is due partly to its presence in a variety of cultures, defined variously as traditional, modern and postmodern. The result is that scholarship is fractured into a variety of regional studies and a diversity of methodological approaches, many of which offer competing and conflicting visions of contemporary Buddhism. Textual scholars, for example, often appear to be interested in reconciling modern developments with classical writings, characteristically tending towards the portrayal of Buddhism as an essentially unbroken tradition. Many sociologists and anthropologists, on the other hand, often see modern forms of Buddhism as being radically disjoined from the past, emphasizing the disruptive, transformative nature of modernity.

The methodological and practical difficulties associated with the study of contemporary Buddhism mean that a broad overview of the area is generally beyond the capacities of individual scholars. It is intended, however, that this conference will enable students of Buddhism to begin to realize a more coherent vision of the subject. It should at least be possible for researchers of differing intellectual backgrounds to enter into a constructive debate with others. The conference will consist of lecture presentations by internationally recognized scholars, formal debates and special interest group sessions.
Areas for discussion will include Buddhism and modernity, Buddhist nationalism, regional varieties of Buddhism, Buddhism in the West, Buddhist economics, Buddhism and Christianity, and others. It is intended that conference proceedings will be published.

The conference will represent an important first attempt to define the character and status of Buddhism in the contemporary world, and should be of interest to all scholars of Buddhism, and also to students of contemporary religion in general.
